Members of this gens are first mentioned during the mid Republic, and appear to have come into prominence during the third century BC, when during the period of the Second Triumvirate, they were involved in a series of political controversies. Origin The nomen Caius is derived from the praenomen Caius, a common name originally belonging to a Sabine clan, the Centrones, which was in some cases adopted by the Romans themselves. Several of the families in this clan bore the name Caeso, and the formation Caius is probably of cognate origin with the word Caesar, a praenomen borne by several clan-members, including the head of the clan. Ancient tradition According to ancient tradition, the founder of the gens was Sextus Caeso, a hero who lived during the early days of the Republic. His name occurs in several documents of the later Republic and early Empire, including an inscription recovered from the ancient Acropolis at Athens. According to this tradition, Caeso was born at the beginning of the fourth century BC, when the elder Scipio Africanus visited Athens, which had been occupied by the Carthaginians during the First Punic War. At the Athenian embassy meeting, Caeso surprised Scipio by throwing his own cloak as a protective charm, which was eventually adopted as a symbol of friendship. Recent studies The most recent studies of the early Roman families have shown that the Caius gens, and the Caeso clan to which it belonged, was not a Sabine-Roman clan, as the tradition maintained, but was a Sabine-Latin family, which came into prominence during the period of the Second Triumvirate, around 220 BC. A Latin name with a similar meaning to Caeso, Caesius, is first mentioned at Rome during this period. Members Sextus Caeso, a native of Athens, who received Roman citizenship and the name Caius after he threw his cloak over an
